Native Lords Of Quito In The Age Of The Incas: The Political Economy Of North Andean Chiefdoms (Cambridge Studies In Social And Cultural Anthropology)

Synopsis

By the time of Columbus, the people of Ecuador's tropical highlands had created small but remarkably complex and interlinked political societies. These small societies for many years proved able to fight off the overwhelming might of the Inca state. But around 1500 they fell to Inca invaders who, in turn, soon lost their dominion to Spanish warlords. Frank Salomon draws on large stores of sources to reconstruct the political and economic institutions of pre-Inca societies. Their structure before and during the Inca interlude reveals diversity in the Andean world. Salomon provides remarkable insight into the functioning of these 'chiefdoms', emphasizing their importance for the understanding of rank, inequality, privilege and central power in stateless societies. He also contributes to our understanding of expansion, colonization, and the adaptive relationships between indigenous and imposed regimes in a context of precapitalist statecraft.

The author seems to assume a level of familiarity with the geography similar to his own in the beginning, making it a little difficult to get through. However, if you stick with it you will be rewarded with a wealth of knowledge that is broad in scope and well supported.
