Synopsis

If you have a desire to grow your own food, like making practical use of recycled materials, and wish to add another element to your sustainable living plan, keyhole gardens are a magnificent option. It is the perfect design for an urban garden as it requires only a small space. Keyhole gardens are low maintenance, self-feeding, and low water-usage food growers. Your kitchen scraps, junk mail and grass clippings can put food on your table. These raised bed gardens also make gardening easier on the back and knees. This type of garden is making a huge difference in the lives of rural areas in Africa where the soil is poor and rainfall is scarce. It's design provides a continual supply of nutrients to the soil and requires a limited amount water to produce abundant vegetable growth. This would be an excellent choice as a survival garden. This 3000 word tutorial will equip you with information complete with photos to get you started. Come and see what it's all about. Grow your own veggies and see how much better they taste!
